Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: . . . in considerable abundance, and offered a welcome addition to our rations, which, although good, soon became appallingly monotonous. Such additional food was however an insignificant boon compared with the abundance of fresh fruit and vegetables which we were enabled to get for the next few days. Oranges, lemons, citrons, and pomellos abounded, and there were a few bananas. The oranges, being just ripe and of the finest quality, claimed our greatest attention. Vegetables were also much in request: tomatoes onions, beetroot, lettuces, cabbages, new peas, beans, and potatoes being obtainable in small quantities. It was interesting to note that, under the influence of fresh fruit and vegetables, the veldt sores, from which so many suffered, rapidly improved, and by the time the column reached Rustenburg many of the milder cases were quite healed. Pumpkins were numerous, but unfortunately they are poor things, even when nothing else is obtainable, and, so far as we saw, they were generally left alone, except by the natives. In this neighbourhood tobacco is grown in large quantities, and is considered the finest in the country. There were many women and children in the farms hereabout, and one could not help noticing the kindly nature of the British soldier in his dealings with them. All must have felt sorry for these, the weakest--although, as far as the women were concerned, the bitterest--elements of the Boer population. The sad, tear-stained, yet scowling faces and quivering lips of the women, the half-friendly, halftimorous and...
