Excerpt: . . . would still remain to bear witness against all that is slothful or haphazard in education. Aristotles discussion of education in the Politics is unfortunately only a fragment, but it is sufficient to give us an outline of his views. His aim is a practical one (ov yvStai oAa irpais, as in the Ethics), and his system is not bound up so closely wi. h his philosophy. Education, he begins by saying, is a state question; each polity involves a corresponding tone or character (jJOos) in its citizens, and to the development of this JjOos education must be directed; therefore the education must be relative to the polityA man, too, does not belong entirely to himself; he is a part of the state, and should be made to realise ita. Thirdly, without state regulation we get negligence such as prevails all through Greece, except in...
