This gravel remains on the beach, and is accumulated there: none of it is to be found either in the dunes, or on the surface of the meadows, though they are covered with sand to a considerable distance from the sea; because the winds carry away nothing but this sand, which is very fine. The wind was at that time strong, and the weather dry; and I saw the sand whirling in clouds along the whole length of that extensive coast. This is a great inconvenience with respect to the channel, which at present forms the only communication between the gulph and the sea: because the westerly winds, when long continued, raise the sand from the whole coast in that direction, and clouds of it flying across the channel, a great quantity falls into the water, and this it is necessary to clear away, else the passage would soon be obstructed. Much more labour would however be required for this purpose, and all perhaps ineffectually, if a high palisade had not been raised across the strand, along that part of the channel to which the town does not extend; and much the greater part of the sand, being intercepted by this is accumulated at its foot. y, 3, 5. . When I had reached the meadows, but was still at a great distance from Ilarnorninze, I could not imagine what it was that I saw on that side the horizon; it seemed to me that I...
