There are few if any tooth powders which are really injurious, but their antiseptic power is limited by the conditions under which they are used and the excessive claims made for these simple preparations as to their efficacy in destroying germs, sterilizing the mouth, preventing the formation of tartar, and even preventing or curing pyorrhea, are out of all proportion to the facts. A good calcium carbonate, alkaline, mouth wash is of value for its antacid properties, and the antiseptics, such as menthol, benzoic acid, thymol, eucalyptol, etc. , which are added have a limited efficiency. Plain hydrogen dioxide, however, is probably as efficient an artificial mouth wash as is available. The great claims made for the liberation of oxygen in the mouth and the effect so produced must be looked at askance; even though the statements may be true to a certain extent theoretically, the effect produced in the mouth is problematic. The claims that the breath is purified are obviously false. The breath may be perfumed or sweetened, but bad breath coming from decaying teeth or lung trouble or indigestion is not purified by the use of any tooth paste, powder or wash, whatever it may contain. Some of the preparations are accompanied by circulars giving laboratory reports and imposing pictures of microscopic slides, before and after using, showing the germicidal effect of the products in question. A laboratory experiment of this kind by no means parallels the conditions...
